5. Swabbing the Sensor

If stubborn specks remain after brushing, then a more aggressive approach using swabs and solution will be required. Open a SensorSwab or SensorSwipe applicator and apply one or two drops of Eclipse solution. Immediately apply the swab to the left side of the sensor. Using the same amount of pressure that you would writing with a pen or pencil, draw the swab all the way to the right. Do not lift the swab off the sensor. Maintaining the same pressure, reverse the angle of the swab and draw it back to the left edge of the sensor. You will have to work fairly quickly since the Eclipse solution evaporates very rapidly.

Quickly swab the sensor with Eclipse to remove stubborn specks.

6. Retest the Sensor

Take another test image of a neutral subject. There should be a significant improvement in image clarity, but some specks may still remain, especially in the corners. Again, use your best judgment to determine if another attempt at cleaning the sensor is justified.

This clear test image shows that the sensor has been successfully cleaned.

Use both of the systems described here to get the cleanest sensor possible and run a test image every few weeks to evaluate for sensor dust. Regular checking and cleaning will help avoid frustration and save hours on the computer cloning and healing spots on every image.
