Use a hand blower to blow out the mirror chamber.

2. Activate Sensor Cleaning Mode

Canon DSLRs have a menu function "Sensor Clean" that locks up the mirror, opens the shutter and cuts power to the sensor to eliminate the electrostatic charge. Nikon users will need the optional AC power supply in order to access the Sensor Clean mode on their cameras. It is not advisable to circumvent this by simply putting the camera into "Bulb" mode and holding the shutter down. The risk is too great that your finger will slip off the shutter or the battery will run low, both resulting in the shutter and mirror disengaging prematurely, trapping the brush or swab and damaging the mechanisms.

Activate the Sensor Clean mode on the camera.

3. Blow Off the Sensor

With the camera now in Sensor Clean mode, use the hand blower to remove any large chunks of dust. This initial step won't likely remove all the dust, but will remove larger specks that could potentially scratch the sensor filter later. DO NOT use canned air. Propellant could be blown onto the sensor or, worse, the high pressure could blow dust behind the filter and permanently trapping debris between it and the sensor.

4. Brush the Sensor

Each of the brushes requires "charging" before cleaning the sensor. The static charge attracts the dust off the sensor when the brush is applied LIGHTLY to the sensor. The idea is to loosen and pull the dust into the brush, not to sweep it off like a broom.

To charge the Copper Hill SensorSweep brush, rub the bristles rapidly over a piece of vellum or other clean piece of paper. To charge the Sensor Brush from VisibleDust, hold the brush upright and use compressed air to blow across the bristles. Be sure to hold the can level to avoid getting propellant on the brush. Now take the charged brush and gently sweep, "tickling" with very light pressure, from one side of the sensor to the other. Use canned air to clean both brushes; recharge and repeat as necessary.

Charge the brush with compressed air. Lightly brush the sensor with the charged brush. To be Cont.
